LONDON STREET SKETCHES.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

Here is an amusing example of that bland, gentlemanly, useful humbug, the fourth-rate family doctor. Although undoubtedly a humbug, he is not a quack. His professional acquirements are quite up to the average mark, although they seldom go beyond it. He has satisfied the College of Surgeons and he has passed the Hall with decency; he has even, perhaps, graduated as M. B. at London, and is consequently styled doctor by courtesy. But he is a humbug for all that. He is not satisfied with the average professional status to which his average professional acquirements and average professional brain would if honestly worked, confine him; he soars high above this, on the strength of a bland, impressive manner, an imposing presence, and a certain quiet audacity in prescribing eccentric but harmless remedies for fanciful complaints. He is much too sensible to go beyond his legitimate depth, but his depth is a tolerable deep one; and his plan of elevating himself on moral tiptoes makes it appear considerably deeper than it really is. As I said before, with all his humbug and pretense he can, if he likes, be really useful, and his waiting-room is daily thronged with real or fanciful sufferers, who are quite justified in placing a modest belief in him. Their mistake consists in believing in him absolutely on the mere strength of a bland, impressive presence.

Who is this red-faced, white-haired, pompous old gentleman who is holding forth in a window of the "Senior"? He is.

AN OLD OFFICER.

who retired on half pay forty years ago, a humble, blundering captain, and who, by dint of long standing, has worked his way up into the dignified list of generals. When in active service he knew absolutely nothing of his duty; he was the stock regimental by-word whenever the subject of military incompetence was the subject upon whose shoulders the responsibility of all regimental blunders was laid, and subalterns, six weeks old, would pose him with impossible questions and record his oracular replies. Now, however, that he has been cut off for forty years or so from anything in the shape of practical experience, in military matters, and so has attained the rank of Major General, he is looked upon as an important authority on the organization of armies, and advanced strategy. He is a country magistrate and a member for an important borough, and his orations on Horse-Guards mismanagement and military innovations, though little regarded in the House, are looked upon by the outside public with a respect which is born rather of his military rank than of his military knowledge.

A CIRCUS MAN.

This anomalous gentleman, who forms one of a group of four or five seedy but flashy individuals who are loafing about the doors of a theatrical public house in Bow street, is an ex-quæstor, and a proprietor of a traveling circus. A few years ago he was known as that daring and graceful rider, Anibale Corinaki, whose "Courier of the Dardanelles" on fourteen horses was justly celebrated as the most thrilling performance ever witnessed in this or any other country. But Anibale grew too fat for the business, so he married the widow of his late employer and set up as a circus proprietor on his own account. His present position as master of the ring, is one of qualified dignity. It is true that by virtue of his office, he is entitled to appear in a braided military frock, jack-boots, and a gold lace cap; but he has, on the other hand, to submit to nightly affronts from ill-conditioned jesters, whose mildest insults take the form of riddles, with offensive answers, calculated to cover him perfectly with confusion.

A POLICEMAN.

Here comes a tall, soldierly man in civilian clothes. He is soldierly in his carriage, only he has no mustache, and his little black eyes are quick and restless. He is awake to most things, and his only delusion is that being a policeman in plain clothes, he looks like a prosperous shop-keeper, a confidential clerk, a nobleman of easy manners, or a country yokel in town for a "speer," according to the characters which the peculiarities of his several cases require him to assume. But the disguises are a failure. The more he disguises himself the more he looks like a policeman in plain clothes, and as long as he continues in the force his official identity will assert itself.

AN OLD BACHELOR.

Here is a curious old bachelor of eccentric habits. Nobody knows very much about him, except a confidential man servant who effectually defeats any attempts to pump him on the subject of his master's eccentricities. All that is known of him is that he lives in a lodging house in Duke street, St. James'. His valet is the only person who is ever allowed to enter his room; his meals are carefully but not expensively organized, and served with extraordinary punctuality; he has a horror of children and to bacco, and a nervous dread of Hanson cabs; he takes a walk, between two and three every afternoon, round St. James' Square, along Pall Mall, up St. James' street, and so home, stopping regularly at Sam's to look at the profile pictures of distinguished sporting and other noblemen, and finishing up with a Bath bun and a glass of cherry brandy at the corner of Bond street. He is supposed by some to be a bankrupt banker, by others a disgraced clergyman, by others an escaped convict of desperate character, and by the more rational portion of his observers as a harmless monomaniac. He never gives his name, and his lodgings are taken for him by his valet. There is a rumor afloat that he is a royal descendant of Hannah Lightfoot, and that he is only waiting for an opportunity to declare his rights and step at once into the throne of England; but I believe that this theory is confined to an imaginative and romantic few.

A VAGABOND.

Here is one of those miserable ghosts that start up from time to time in the London streets, to sicken the rich man of his wealth and to disgust the happy man with his happiness. If the wretched object before us could put his thoughts into intelligible English, what a story of misery, want, filth, sickness, and crime he could unfold! He is of course a thief; who in his situation would not be? He is a liar; but his
